“In Italy and in other places of the world, the debate on end-of-life care and euthanasia has been rekindled. What would you say is of particular cause for concern?”

I am greatly concerned about this topic because it seems a vitalistic conception of life is creeping into the sensibility of the majority, one which emphasizes a youth- and health-focused concept of life. On the basis of this point-of-view, everything that does not correspond to a certain ideal of well-being and to a certain conception of health is expelled.

Within this concept lies the temptation of a new form of eugenics: Whoever is not born healthy must not be born. This is combined on the other end of the life spectrum with the idea that those who are alive but not healthy must also die: this is euthanasia. It is a dangerous insinuation which poisons society. Therefore, the Church must remind everyone that frailty and natural weakness is a constitutive part of human nature and the whole of creation.

What we need is a new relationship of fraternity among all people. Weakness demands the urgency of fraternity because it is in fraternity that we care for one another. It is through fraternity that we support one another. “

In an interview marking five years as President of the Pontifical Academy for Life, Archbishop Vincenzo Paglia laments a creeping “youth- and health-focused concept of life” which seeks to eliminate anyone with any type of infirmity.
